Current or Ongoing Research Projects

*Moore, C., Warfel, E., Cassity-Caywood, W., Corley, C., Asabere, G., Gagné, P. Cultures of Child Protection: Exploring state-to-state and nationwide child welfare systems. A mixed-methods ethnographic study of state-to-state bureaucratic child welfare cultures conveyed through the perceptions and experiences of practicing child protective services specialists. This project involves developing and administering an original survey along with in-depth qualitative interviews of CPS workers throughout the United States in addition to continuing content analyses of state child protection services websites and secondary data analysis of child welfare reports and publicly accessible datasets.

Moore, C. Stories of membership in an Eastern Kentucky epigenetic cancer cluster. An auto-ethnographic study of familial membership in a public health-tracked epigenetic cancer cluster. This project will explore the relationships between coal mining, poverty, and cancer among related social factors that have influenced the connected experiences of family members who have lived with or died from inherited elevated cancer risks over the past century.

Moore, C. Exploring the religious roots of rural child abuse. An ethnographic study of rural religiosity and its connections to parental values and beliefs about disciplinary practices that may lead to abusive and traumatic consequences for children.

Moore, C. Fridays at the barn. An ethnographic study of Kentucky bluegrass history and culture through the standpoint experiences of residents of Rosine, Kentucky, the birthplace of Bill Monroe. This mix-methods project involves participant observation, in-depth interviews, historical analysis, and secondary analysis to explore the evolution of a Kentucky heritage venue, The Barn, a site recognized for its cultural contributions to early rural bluegrass movements.
